

Addicted to games?

Fact or Fiction

There are two sides for the argument of whether the case of video game addiction is fact or fiction. Those that think of it as fiction claim that gamers do not have a chemical dependency on video games. On the other hand, those that believe the case to be a fact compare it to a gambling addiction, in which they both have psychological and other consequences.

What should we do?

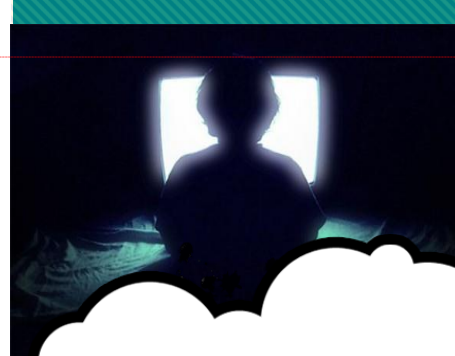

Ways to spot signs, and prevent video game addiction.

Comment [U1]: Hi

Good work on the brochure so far! Here are a few specific comments and suggestions:

+ The information you plan to include is good, but pay attention to the logic of your arguments. What is the first thing your audience should see? What is the next?

+ You have a good balance of text and visuals that are appealing and appropriate for the topic.

- If you compare the inner panels to the outer panels, the text in the first inner panel will go across the folded part. This is okay as long as it spreads across panels evenly, but think about how people open this type of brochures: typically, we open the front panel and read the first inner panel. If part of the text in this first inner panel is covered by the other (closed) panels, then we have to open the whole brochure to read the hidden text. I hope this make sense.

If you want to discuss any of these things further, feel free to post here, and I will respond.
